Are cyberterrorists undermining our democracy?

The issue of cybersecurity and our elections continue to generate headlines and concerns around the country. From the hack of 500 million Yahoo accounts to security breaches at BlueCross BlueShield and T-Mobile, we all know government will also be a target. While these attacks are expected, election officials have a responsibility to speak up when we see the potential for problems. That's why I've been sounding the alarm about how important it is we do everything we can to protect voter information. In this week's edition of Time Magazine I was able to share our story and discuss the fact these attacks are not just intended to steal or manipulate information, they're also striking at the foundation of our democracy by undermining the confidence people have in our system of elections.

Sincerely,

Mechele
